Great children's story.

At first the boy, Leif, is reluctant to give up a chance to kill the narwhal for its horn, but Annie persuades him to help them free the narwhal. In this version of history, the youngsters give Leif a map of North America that he will later use for his own exploration of the area. The story moves quickly, if somewhat improbably, and readers can learn a little bit about narwhals and Viking culture from reading this account. Plus, it all takes place in a timely fashion with the siblings back home in time for supper. Fourth and fifth graders will enjoy this one as well as its nonfiction companion. The black and white illustrations add even more interest to the story, and I had to wonder how those youngsters would explain their arrival in a tree house rather than a boat.

I felt maybe it was a bit scattered in terms of contentâ€”MTH usually focuses on one big idea, but this one seems to straddle Viking explorers and cetaceans, with a strong emphasis on the importance of manners. Not that itâ€™s necessarily a bad thing; narwhals, Vikings, and hospitality obviously fit together in a cultural way. It just didnâ€™t give me a super clear picture about what the theme of the next quartet of books would be, or even if there was one. All of this aside, itâ€™s still Magic Tree

All of this aside, itâ€™s still Magic Tree House, and it still succeeds in what it does.

As with all of the Magic Tree House Books, Mary Pope Osborne takes a culture that the vast majority of young readers know nothing about and makes a good story out of it. I really liked out this installment related back to two previous adventures in the tree house. Another wonderful addition to a cherished series.

85 pgs. This is a great book in this series of fun adventures. This time the kids meet Leif Erickson and Eric the Red on their visit to Greenland. There are lots of facts at the end of the book on different whales. Kids will surely enjoy this one. Highly recommended for Grades 3-5.
